

Oklahoma Goat Test

July 24, 2017

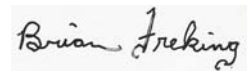

Just like previous years it seems to take some time for animals to adjust to a new environment. The stress of being hauled any distance can be a challenge. Being thrown in with new herd mates and even different diets are all environmental conditions where animals may acclimate at different rates.

Dr. Whitworth and I make an overall assessment each time we work the goats just to see if herd health is changing. Overall this work date seemed to show that goats have been stressed. We've had some heat indexes that have been on the extreme. The hair coats are not quite as slick and healthy as we would like to see them. Some goats are showing some signs of snotty noses and tear staining around the eyes. We do treat the goats based on these symptoms and try to maintain herd health and I would say they are still acclimating.

When you look at the updated information you will see quite a variation in weight gain/loss. I usually don't put much stock in these early weight checks on an individual basis but look more on the changes as group. This update basically shows no gain in the last 14 days and I think the heat and timing of acclimation is a big reason we are not seeing the gains.

All the goats have plenty of forage and they do have access to shade. On a good note in my opinion the FEC numbers are staying the same and Famacha score are going down slightly. If history is any indication I expect weight gain to start moving up and likely at a compensatory rate.

Sincerely,
